What is a farmer?

A farmer is someone who grows food to feed people. If you grow food at your house, you can be just like a farmer!

How did gardening change in 2020?

In 2020, a new coronavirus hit the United States and the rest of the world and made getting food a challenge! Many people decided to grow their own food. In a normal year, 35% of households in the US grow food at home or in a community garden. In the spring of 2020, many garden centers sold out of seed packets and plants because more people were turning to home gardening to feed their families.

Why do people garden?

People garden at home for many different reasons. They like the convenience of “shopping” in their back yards. The taste of vegetables fresh from the plant is a special treat. Choosing only to plant those vegetables that the family will eat is a good choice. Having extra vegetables to share with neighbors and family creates an atmosphere of community.

Extra vegetables may also be sold to create additional income for the family. In addition, those extra vegetables can be preserved, canned or frozen for use in the fall and winter. Gardening at home encourages people to experiment with new varieties of old favorites or to try a totally new vegetable. Families may also try new ways of cooking the vegetables. Spending time outside with others who also enjoy gardening is another plus of the home garden.

Do you want to start a garden?

Gardening takes planning and tools. A garden center will have a lot of helpful information. Look around in your community. There may be people that garden and are willing to help your family start your own backyard “farm”.

Gardening Supplies Scavenger Hunt

An activity for the whole family!

As with most new activities, certain equipment is needed. An adult would need to gather the tools and hide them around the yard. Each "gardener" should be given a list of the tools that need to be found. Set a time limit and have fun! The more involved the youngsters are in the start of the garden, the more likely they will continue with the fun throughout the growing season.
